

Oksana Afitska (Lancaster university)

Abstract

Drawing on empirical classroom-based research data, this presentation identifies and discusses various traits of assessment tasks in science where English language learners are disadvantaged compared with their native speaking peers. The presentation concludes with a set of implications for practice, derived from the reported research, which aim to contribute to a reduction in the performance gap in science between English native and non-native speaking learners.